Four Loops
— of —
Curiosities

Being Certain Private Entries from the Journal of

Archael Viremont

Senior Archivist of the Luminous Fold
Fellow of the Seventh Circle
Honorary Member of the Cartographic Society of Iterants

Copied and Preserved in the Grand Archive of the Luminous Fold,
One Hundred and Twelve Loops
after their Composition.

FOUR LOOPS OF CURIOSITIES
Being Certain Private Entries from the Journal of Archael Viremont
Senior Archivist of the Luminous Fold
Fellow of the Seventh Circle
Honorary Member of the Cartographic Society of Iterants

Copied and Preserved in the Grand Archive of the Luminous Fold,
One Hundred and Twelve Loops After Their Composition

Entry I

Cycle 12 (contested), Third Quarter (approximate), Loop 1 — Departure from the Luminous Fold

If these pages are opened by any hand other than mine in due return, then let it be understood: this was not composed for record, but for remembrance.

I departed this morning from the outer ring of the Luminous Fold. The geometry of it remains exact in memory—the way light strikes stone in measured planes, the absence of scent beyond mineral and intent, the quiet certainty that each Hour belongs to the one that follows.

I note the time—Cycle 12, Third Quarter, Loop 1—with the understanding that such notation will not endure.

Within Hours, I encountered three travelers. Each offered a different Cycle. None disputed the others.

“The day moves correctly,” one said.

I begin here, so that if I do not return, you will understand:

Agreement is not a universal condition.

Entry II

Cycle Unknown, Loop 1 — First Entry into the Deyune Steps

The land opens without boundary.

Grass stretches in every direction, bending in long, continuous waves beneath a wind that does not cease. It produces a low sound—not unlike distant surf, though no water is present.

Encampments appear briefly on the horizon—small geometries of canvas and pole—then dissolve into movement as one approaches.

Curiosity: nothing is allowed to settle.

I attempted to mark a position with a driven stake.

When I returned, the stake remained.

Nothing else did.

Entry III

Cycle Unknown, Loop 1 — Among the Steps

The air carries dust and dry sweetness—crushed grass, warmed by sun.

A Pathkeeper recited a route for me this evening. His voice was steady, almost musical, describing distance not in measures, but in sensations—when the wind shifts, when the ground hardens, when the sky “opens.”

I requested he write it.

He laughed.

“You carry too much already,” he said.

Curiosity: knowledge retained only in motion.

I do not know how to preserve this.

Entry IV

Cycle Indeterminate, Loop 1 — On Movement

I attempted to remain in one place.

This proved more difficult than anticipated.

The ground is stable, yet the expectation of movement persists. Others pass, glance, and continue, as though stillness were an error to be corrected.

Curiosity: immobility as anomaly.

I moved again.

Entry V

Cycle 19, Loop 2 — Approaching the Ashen Spine

The air changes before the land.

It grows dry, then sharp, carrying the taste of ash long before the first blackened ridge appears. The sky dims—not by cloud, but by suspended particulate that filters light into a dull, constant glow.

Heat rises unevenly from the ground.

Curiosity: warmth without source.

I find breathing requires intention here.

Entry VI

Cycle 23, Loop 2 — Interior of the Ashen Spine

Sleep is not easily achieved.

The ground radiates heat well into darkness. The air trembles—visibly—distorting edges of stone and tool alike.

I woke to a cracking sound, low and sustained. By morning, a ridge I had noted was gone.

No one remarked upon it.

I presented a model regarding such instability.

“Does it keep the ground from breaking?” I was asked.

It did not.

Curiosity: knowledge accepted only if it prevents failure.

Entry VII

Cycle Unknown, Loop 2 — Ashen Spine (continued)

Tools are worn rapidly here.

Metal softens, edges dull, bindings loosen. Ink dries too quickly, requiring constant replenishment.

The inhabitants adjust without pause.

I do not.

This places me at a disadvantage I cannot mitigate through theory.

Entry VIII

Cycle 27, Late Quarter, Loop 2 — Varnhalt Frontier

Varnhalt is noise.

Metal striking wood. Voices overlapping. Animals calling. The air smells of sweat, iron, smoke, and fermented grain.

I observed a negotiation.

A Chancebinder stood beside one party. At a moment of tension, she closed her eyes briefly.

The other party conceded.

Coin was exchanged.

Curiosity: outcome as commodity.

Entry IX

Cycle Unknown, Loop 2 — Varnhalt Interior

The structures here are layered rather than built.

Wood over stone, fabric over wood, additions without removal. Nothing aligns precisely, yet all functions.

I slept above a stable. The smell rose through the floor—sharp, persistent.

A contract I reviewed altered overnight—not rewritten, but adjusted.

Both parties accepted the new form.

My notes did not match.

Curiosity: agreement without fixity.

Entry X

Cycle Indeterminate, Loop 2 — On Varnhalt Systems

Ownership appears conditional.

Items change hands not always through exchange, but through influence—subtle or otherwise.

Curiosity: possession as a temporary state.

I have begun marking my belongings more carefully.

Entry XI

Cycle 3, Early Quarter, Loop 3 — Arrival at Virelay

The air carries salt.

It clings to the skin, the tongue. The sound of the sea is constant—waves striking shore in measured intervals.

I recorded these intervals.

They were consistent.

This was reassuring.

Entry XII

Cycle 9, Loop 3 — Virelay Coast

A deviation.

Small, but measurable.

I presented it to a Tidewatcher.

“It will correct,” he said, watching the horizon.

He did not examine my notes.

Curiosity: trust in repetition over observation.

I find this untenable.

I also find myself wishing to believe it.

Entry XIII

Cycle Unknown, Loop 3 — Edge of the Sea

The horizon resists certainty.

Ships moving outward diminish too quickly—or not at all. Distance does not scale reliably beyond a certain point.

I was advised not to travel further.

“It does not hold the same way,” I was told.

I accepted this.

Entry XIV

Cycle Uncertain, Loop 3 — Entry into Bellroot Vale

Bellroot accumulates.

The air grows damp, carrying the scent of soil and growth. Light fractures through layers of leaves, shifting with each step.

Sound settles—becomes less distinct, yet more complete.

Curiosity: density without boundary.

I lowered my voice without deciding to.

Entry XV

Cycle 8 (approximate), Loop 3 — Bellroot Interior

I was given a meal.

The preparation lacked all measurable structure—no ratios, no documentation.

And yet—it worked.

Not merely as nourishment, but as… stabilization.

I attempted replication.

I failed.

Curiosity: effect without reproducible cause.

Entry XVI

Cycle 11 (estimated), Loop 3 — Bellroot Interior

Two individuals worked side by side—one tending exposed roots, the other redirecting water flow.

They did not speak.

Their actions aligned.

I asked who led.

They did not understand the question.

Curiosity: coordination without designation.

Entry XVII

Cycle 41 (estimated), Loop 4 — Drowned Reach

Water obscures more than sight.

Sound carries unevenly. Distant voices arrive as whispers. Nearby movement is muted.

A Depthwarden recovered a fragment of stone—carved, incomplete.

They named it.

I objected.

“If we do not name it, it disappears again,” they said.

Curiosity: naming as preservation.

Entry XVIII

Cycle 47 (approximate), Loop 4 — Beneath the Surface

I descended briefly.

Orientation failed immediately. Light fractured. Direction dissolved.

I surfaced disoriented.

They observed.

They did not assist.

Curiosity: experience as instruction.

Entry XIX

Cycle Unknown, Loop 4 — Drowned Reach (continued)

Structures beneath water persist in fragments—arches without walls, columns without roofs.

They are catalogued.

Interpreted.

Curiosity: reconstruction without completion.

Entry XX

Cycle Indeterminate, Loop 4 — Entry into the Glass Expanse

The ground reflects.

Not cleanly, but in fractured angles. Light scatters, producing images that do not align with position.

Walking produces a sense of delay—as though movement is observed after it occurs.

Curiosity: perception without confirmation.

Entry XXI

Cycle Indeterminate, Loop 4 — Glass Expanse (continued)

I measured a distance.

The Refractionist agreed.

Later, she insisted it had changed.

My notes remained consistent.

She smiled.

Curiosity: agreement without permanence.

Entry XXII

Cycle 40, Final Quarter, Loop 4 — Closing Entry

If these pages are read in my absence—

Let them stand not as conclusions, but as interruption.

I departed with systems.

I return with exceptions.

The world does not conform.

It holds.

If I have forgotten this—

Then this journal is the more accurate account.

End of Selected Entries
Recovered and Entered into Archive, Luminous Fold
Preservation Date: Loop 112 Following Original Composition